The White League, which is enid to have been "built up on the debris of a former secret organization known as the Knighte of the White Oamellia," bad for a long time threatened the Kellogg Government with an "uprising of popular indignation," and the State authorities had been warned by the lynching of the white Republican office-holders at Coushatta that the menace was not an idla one. The time, however, for another appeal to the electors was drawing near, and the Kellogg faction, having to make a choice between the risk of provoking the whites to an outbreak and the sertainty, if they allowed matters to take their course, of being beaten at the polls, took the desperate step of passing an Electoral Registration Law, which the white voters could be reduced to a minority at the next election. There can be no doubt that upon this the White League resolved upon an appeal to arms by way of protest if not with a view to rid themselves of the moutous August are that our imports continue to of the State Government. (Pall Mall Gazette.) The object of punishment is the protection of the community against the repetition of the acts for which punishment is inflicted. It follows from this definition that the same offence may proporly be visited with different penalties according as there is greater or less danger of its being committed. Where the temptation to crime is especially great, or the facilities for indulging in it especially numerous, the law may rightly help the possible criminal to remain innocent by surrounding guilt with special inconveniences. There is no & priori objection, therefore, to punishing assaults more severely. for either of the reasons just mentioned, are particular objections in the case of this or that class, or it may be necessary to take special precautions against the protection thus afforded being abused; but, as a general rule, the fact that any class of persons are exposed more than others to the risk of violence is a sufficient reason for regarding assaults on them as more criminal than others. This is one of the points to which the inquiries of the Homo Secretary may profitably be directed.

PUNISHMENT FOR ASSAULT.

Three classes of persons will at once suggest themselves as being, on different grounds. peculiarly in danger of violence-women and children, the police, and witnesses in oriminal cases. As regards the first, the inducement to assault them takes two forms-propinquity and safety. The women assaulted are commonly the wives or the mistresses of the assailant the children assaulted are mostly his own children. In other cases an element of chance comes in. The rough may make up his mind to "have it out" with this man or to "do for " that man; but he may not happen to meet his enemy and may not have leisure to go and seek him. The woman who keeps his house bas the advantage of being always at hand. When he comes home irritated at something which has gone wrong she is within reach o the poker, and not very far removed from his in the same room, and it will be strange if, in Side Park The start was witnessed by a large the narrow quarters within which they are all number of people, and the success or failure of thing to provoke its father's wrath. Nor, unless the offender nilows bimself to be altogether carried out of himself, is there muchdanger that yielding to the temptation in the case either of women or children will bring down any punishment: Wives are not given to appearing against their husbands in the police court, and children cannot bring their fathers there unless some one class takes up their bause. family depends upon the husband and father for support, it is a serious reflection that to was made in three hours and a quarter after get him punished will entail the loss of his carnings during the time of his imprisonment. Affection and calculation combine, therefore, to reached the above at least a mile shead of the chause immunity to the assultant in a very great number of oness. It is only when the violence necessiates a journey to the hospital, or comes near to marder as to seriously frighten the neighbours, that prosecution follows. At first sight these reasons will seem amply anficient to justify a resort to increased penalties in the case of assaults committed on women. There is a counterbalancing consideration; however, which may suggest a doubt whether the additional protection which women undoubtedly need will be best afforded in this way. If we lay down broadly that all violence done to women shall be mure severely punished than similar violence done to men, we shall be in danger of leaving out of sight the fact that very great provocation is often given by women. Of course this is no extenuation of the grosser forms of violence, of kicking, bonebreaking, beating with pokers, and the like; indeed, it would probably be safe to say that, where this degree of violence is inflicted provocation has been far more rarely given than in cases where the assault has been less aggravated. But we are constrained by truth to may that there are instances in which a wife gets a severe beating without the husband being really much to blace. It is a brutal form of correction, no doubt, but the conduct which has provosed it has, in its own way, been not less brutal. . Take, for example, the not uncommon case of a woman who day after day wastes her husband's earnings in strong drink. The husband comes home, perhaps, and finds his wife dead drank upon the floor for the fiftieth time, and his children lying naked and starving round ber. The money that ought to have fed them has gone to the public-house, warm and decent have gone to the pawnshap, on credit for new, and $585 for old, quiet. This is a state of things which in many poor homes goes on for years. Suppose that the husband is at last so erasperated by the sight. On London.of bis own and his children's misery that, driven " beside himself," he takes up a stick and gives his wife a severe beating. Here is a case certainly of a violent assault, but it involves a wholly different kind of guilt from that of the husband who comes home drunk, having apent and then beate his wife because she has neither | ON CALCUTTA, -Bunk, on demand 223 food nor money to give him. Yet a carelessly On Shanghal .drawn Act prescribing an increased penulty for assaults committed on women might apply to both cases, and the magistrates would have no

power to discriminate between them. As regards the police, the inducements to assault are obvious. They are revenge for proslothful in making future arrests. If the police there would be no difficulty in treating violence offered to them as especially criminal, officers of the law ought to be invested with peculiar sanctity. It should be a fact perfectly well known to the criminal classes that to assault them is a more dangeroug business than to assault other mon, and that on the appearance of a policeman to take them into custody they had better give themselves up quietly lest a worse thing huppen to them. In the absence of this feeling the law and the breakers of the law are too nearly untched. If the policemen has the magistrate at his back, the rough bas his companions, who think the delight of main. ing a consuible champly purchased by a few weeks' seclusion. The only difficulty in attach ing a beavier penulty to offences against the police is the uncomfortable suspicion that the and that, if the punishment were greater, the temptation to do this, in the hope of extorting hush money, or preventing counter-charges made against them from being believed, would be greater also. If the police are to enjoy the increased protection which they undoubtedly ought to enjoy, the public have a right to enjoy increased protection against the police. Offences committed by constables in the execution of their duty, and most chiefly the offence of false witness even in the form of exaggeration, should be punished more severely than the same offences when committed by others. By this means, and by a scale of payment sufficient to attract and retain men of good character, the public would cease to regard the police with any alarm, and there would then be no objection to-rather there would be every reason for -giving them the additional protection which the dangerous character of some of their work | yee-chong to travelling trader. demands.

NOVEL RACE AT CORK .-- An exciting race took place the other day at the Cork Barracks, between Mr. Arnott, of Woodlands, and Mr. Playfair, of the Royal Horse Artiflery. Punishment for acts of The Morning Post says :- Penalties may be too severs and may delact their object by their. excess of severity. Un the other band, they may defeat it by an excess of leniency. It is the latter of these difficulties which presess on our immediate attention. Hardly a day passes without evidence of the gradities which the Paterfamilius of the lower classes inflicts on those who have been committed to his protection by the law of God and man. This is the great blot on our social system, and it is now high time to consider by what means it may be removed. The law, as it stands, is indulgent, when the victims of them belong to classes who, lenioucy of their sentences. It is impossible and magistrates render it more so by the that this state of things should be allowed peculiarly exposed to danger. There may be to continue. Attempts have been made by private members of Parliament to arm magistrates with greater powers, but the first effort at reform lies with the magistrates themselves. By enforcing their powers to the utmost they will take a material step towards the suppression of an evil which is a soundal to the country. If it should be found that their authority is not sufficient to deal with the barbarism which is so great a reprosch to ou social system, it will become necessary for the Government to arm thom with more severe penalties. This is precisely one of those questions which the present Government are most likely to entertain, and there can be no doubt that it is possible by a due severity of treatmont to diminish, if not entirely to forbid, the brutality which is so great a reproach to our

> A NOVEL EXPERIMENT IN NAVI. GATION.

The New York papers state that recently a ir. John F. Lacey successfully accomplished the feat of crossing Long Island Sound in a twelve foot rowboat drawn by a kite. The kite was ten feet high by eight feet wide, and was attached to the forward part of the boat by a strong cord, about six hundred feet of which was let out, The wind was blowing northwest at about two LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S OUTFITTERS. The children are probably lying about o'clock p.m. when the start was made from Sea the enterprise was the subject of much comment and speculation. The frush breeze parried the boat steadily out into the Sound, and in a direction toward Port Jefferson, L. I. A sail boat accompanied the kite-propelled adventurers, but the strength of the kite was so great that the sulboat was left behind before the Long Island shore was rouched. When about balf way across the Sound the wind hauled to the west, but the kite continued to draw quite Comprising the Lutest NOVELTIES in cach as well as before, and Port Jefferson-harbour leaving Sea Side Park. The distance is twenty two miles, and the boat drawn by the kite sailboat which accompanied it. Old Field light was the point sailed for, and it was made exactly, and thus on the voyage over about four points to the windward were made. As the success of the experiment had been pronounced impossible, the achievement was very gratifying, and demonstrated that the theories of would-be philosophers were all wide from the mark. The kite was covered with fine white cotton cloth and had a tail of "listing" 100 feet in length. No other motive power than the kite was used | COSTUMES AND POLONAISES. to draw the boat through the water, and there was not the least tendency to fail during the entire trip over. Mr. Lacey is confident that he can guide a boat nearly as closely as if ran by sails, and he is ready to undertake still farther excursions to demonstrate the feasibility of this method of navigation.

Already in the middle of the last century, under the direction of Galectri, the ballet was made a prominent feature on the boards of the Royal Theatra; and from the records of that time we learn that it already began to be regarded with a seriousnus that has hardly been afforded to it closewhere. However, it was not until about fifty years ago that it took the peculiar form which it now holds, and which gives it a national importance. WOMEN AND WAR. In what way do wars and military systems their influence to prevent war? are questions so full of interest as to be worthy of careful consideration. Thoughtless women, not given to look below the surface of things. may be easily caught by the outward pageantry of military life, but true, earnest women look deeper. No matter how bravely they meet the supposed necessity of war, and lay their dearest friends on the altar of sacrifice, such women must have sad misgivings : below the glow of their so-called patriotism burns a deeper fire of love to humanity, leading them to ask if there is not some terrible mistake here-whether the truest love of country can after all consist with slaughtering so many of her children? We venture to assert that no true woman. ever coolly looked in the face the fact that her husband or son was going out on purpose to kill other men without an inward protest against the barbarism which made it necessary. Surely that wife were less than woman who could be glad to know that the hand she is clasping so fondly in hers to-day, is to morrow to be reddened by the blood of fellow-man; no, it is not in woman to do this! But let us go home with one wife, or one mother, after that regiment has marched away, it music, plumes, and bapners: all vanished out of sight, and learn what she
